Workshop Leader:

Cheryl Tarr is a licensed teacher of English as a Second Language (ESL) in the state of North Carolina. Her interest in different languages and cultures began when her family moved to Japan for three years when she was a young child. Cheryl earned her Bachelor of Arts in 1983 in the field of Sociology, with a concentration in Cross-Cultural Studies. After graduating, she worked in Thailand for two years. Upon returning home, she worked for several years in administrative positions but always found herself volunteering to teach English. In 1999, Cheryl earned her M.Ed. in Teaching ESL and began her new career as a teacher. Cheryl has taught in a variety of settings, both academic (K-12 and college preparatory) and community-based (nonprofit and church-related). Married in 1990, Cheryl and her husband Larry have one son in high school.

The Need to Learn English

“In communities all across the United States and its territories and Canada, the number of people who want and need to learn to speak English is increasing rapidly. East, west, north, and south---people who need and want to learn to speak English are our neighbors. One of the best ways to demonstrate and share God's love with our non-English speaking neighbors is through local church-based English as a Second Language Ministries.”

Kendale Moore
National Literacy Missionary for the North American Mission Board
(retired)

“In the Charlotte area, we continue to experience a dramatic increase in international residents, people moving here from around the world. Students in the Charlotte-Mecklenburg School System speak at least 170 different languages. It's true – the nations have come to our neighborhoods, and we have an opportunity to fulfill Acts 1:8 right here where we live and serve. Teaching ESL is a great way for Christians and churches to accomplish that mission.”
